Organizational History

The discovery of gold and the ensuing rush to California to get rich quick often involved adjusting to an environment whose climate and geography were sharply different from home. The Mediterranean climate with its periods of wet and dry, drought and flood caused emigrants to realize the importance of water for their get rich schemes, whether they involved looking for gold or supplying the needs of those looking for gold. Unlike the Miwok tribe of Native Americans, who moved from lower to higher elevations as weather and resources dictated, the miners were tied to the area by the availability of water, which eroded the gold from the mountains and deposited it in Columbia. Soon the control of water became the biggest and most complex struggle facing miners, and Columbia epitomized this struggle.

The Hildreth party has been given the credit for discovering gold in the area, although other evidence points toward a small settlement of miners from Mexico. Nevertheless, the Americans moved in quickly once they heard of the easily found gold and a nearby supply of water. Following their arrival in March, 1850 was a typical hot and dry summer. The creeks dried up and most miners moved down to the rivers or to higher elevations in the continuing search for easy money. Winter brought miners back to the Columbia area following the rains and the return of the seasonal creek. Those merchants who managed to survive the summer realized that maintaining a market relied on a steady supply of water, and local miners realized that a reliable supply of water was needed to find the gold all year around in this location. Together, they established the Tuolumne County Water Company (TCWC) in June of 1851.

The Tuolumne County Water Company was set up as an employee owned and controlled company. Founders went to surrounding areas raising expectations and investors. At the end of June, 1851, 160 shares of stock had been sold, the route had been surveyed, and workers were celebrating. Their efforts to tap into first Five Mile creek, then the south fork of the Stanislaus River were largely unsuccessful, as the creeks were dry and the rivers were low as was usual in the summer months. After almost a year water finally arrived, but there was not enough to sustain full mining operations, and the company was forced to borrow money for capital investments in sawmills, roads and equipment. The Tuolumne County Water Company incorporated in September, 1852, with a new issuance of shares initially valued at $275. While the company was still trying to provide a good and plentiful supply of water, the miners were already protesting the high prices and low volume of water.

As gold yields increased and decreased so too did the population of the town of Columbia. The availability of water and its price strongly influenced the fortune of the town. Water was as precious as gold and a struggle for control of this water between owners of the Tuolumne County Water Company and the miners ensued. The miners, unsatisfied with the high prices and non-responsiveness of the Tuolumne County Water Company, formed the Columbia and Stanislaus River Water Company in 1855. The company soon ran into great financial problems and by the time their ditch was finished and opened, its fate was sealed. The company was sold to pay debts and then resold to the Tuolumne County Water Company or “monster monopoly” as disgruntled miners started calling it.

With the purchase of the Columbia and Stanislaus River Water Company, the Tuolumne County Water Company entered an era of expansion only slightly affected by the unhappy miners, who formed a group of ditch breakers to protest the policies. Their actions resulted in destroyed ditches, flumes and threats to employees and officers of the corporation. Local officials formed a committee of conference and soon thereafter the water continued to expand, taking over ditches, flumes and reservoirs and lakes constructed by other water and fluming companies in the county. As gold production declined, so too did the population, resulting in less demand for water and less income for the company. By the 1880s many ditches were in disrepair and dams and reservoirs reflected a lack of maintenance. A boom period in the 1890s with the arrival of a railroad, increased logging and demand for electricity resulted in the company going into the hydroelectric field, but even this could not sustain the fortunes of the company. By 1903 the remains of the company was being offered for sale, valued at $500,000 with an impressive list of ditches, flumes, dams, lakes and reservoirs all over the county.

Collection Scope and Content Summary

The Tuolumne County Water Company (TCWC) Records consist of approximately 10.8 cubic feet of materials dating between 1853-1909 and document all aspects of the TCWC's business, with particular emphasis on the company's financial records. The water company was a large operation and an intricate part of the economic and social life of the area for many years and the documents reflect significant aspects of mining life. Time and wage books and scrip receipts indicate the miners' dependence on the company; purchase invoices and correspondence detail the costs of constructing the massive flumes and ditches, and shares and stock receipts indicate the relative wealth among the company founders. Other documents indicate the location of specific mines, the ethnic constitution of the townspeople, and the operations of other local businesses. Some correspondence details the problems of the water system itself and the "water war" which engulfed the area and its people with violence and mistrust. The bulk of the collection consists of the financial records of the company, including account books, water receipts for water purchases, and checks and payroll documents.

The collection has been organized into the following series:

Series I: Administrative Records, 1856-1908. .8 cu. ft.

Series II: Legal Records, 1856-1886. .1 cu. ft.

Series III: Operational Records, 1853-1909 .1 cu. ft.

Series IV: Financial Records, 1853-1907. 9.8 cu. ft.

PROVENANCE

The bulk of the TCWC records were discovered on Columbia Historic State Park premises. Apparently, for many years the collection was stored away and forgotten within the park, until about 1987, when park staff investigated an old trunk in the museum and discovered it full of TCWC documents. They were heavily damaged from water, mildew, and insects. The documents were removed, cleaned, and placed in storage boxes in the Archives building.

Staff later discovered that many of the documents that were in decent condition had been removed from the original collection, and dispersed throughout the subject and name files at some point before the trunk was discovered. For example, if a piece of water company correspondence relating to miner supplies was sent to Mr. John Doe, it might have been filed under Doe or it might have been filed under General Store. Additional water company records arrived at the park through individual donations—in particular, the Conlin Family donation in the 1940s (see Conlin Family Papers).

In 2001 special funding was provided by California State Parks to reconstitute the collection, organize it according to archival principles, rehouse the records in acid-free folders and boxes, and create a finding aid to provide enhanced access to the collection. Additional materials relating to the Tuolumne County Water Company may be found at the Tuolumne County Historical Society archives, the Bancroft Library, and the Huntington Library.
